Curious to know how this article was received! I like that the reviewer shared his experience with us. I've had some good feedback from readers so far about being able to dump my photos from Lightroom and import them into Photoshop for edits. I've used Lightroom to adjust the black and white, but let's face it. Shooting images like this is hard. Here's a photo I took that I edited right after I posted it on Instagram. I'm in love with these La Fouine slippers. So I decided to share it on my blog. I hit the "Library" Button and immediately exported a JPEG from the RAW. I brought it to Photoshop. I masked off the zipper and added a black outline. I then replaced the colors in the zipper with a color from the La Fouine website. These slippers are made in France. They have a great website. Spot and Lens Correction is a game changer for me as well. I do have to work on keeping my edits clean though since I tend to overshoot my targets with my alterations. As I added more and more edits, the file became a mess. I couldn't see anything in the layers panel. It was completely overbloated. So I pulled everything out of the layers panel, and healed the far edges of the zipper with the brush tool. You can place files in your Catalog or on the disk, but not in both areas simultaneously. Lightroom uses its own cache for performance optimizations. You've got to wait one minute and a half for each image if you save the file to your hard disk. If you Transfer files between a catalog and the disk, you've got to wait up to four minutes for each image.
